

A Satanic Leaf-tailed Gecko is not only an expert at mimicking leaves and branches, it can also shed its tail to evade predators.

A giraffe melts into the vegetation in Transvaal, South Africa.

Native to southeast Asia, the Baron Caterpillar's disguise allows it to feed on mango and cashew nut trees undetected by its predators.

A Great Gray Owl -- the world's largest owl by length -- blends into a tree in Oregon.

An Asian Vine Snake uses surrounding foliage adjacent to water to catch its primary prey, fish.

A leopard sits in the underbrush in South Africa's Kruger National Park.

A Blue-crowned parrot disappears in the verdant rain forest of Belize.

A wolf peeks behind a tree during fall in Montana.

The color and shape of the wings of the Brimstone Butterfly allow it to blend in perfectly with green vegetation while resting.

The Buff-Tip Moth has developed an astounding camouflage that helps it to hide in plain sight among trees and branches.

A Great Horned Owl hides among autumn foliage in Malheur National Wildlife Refuge, Oregon.

A Spotted Deer, also known as a Chital, disappears in a forest in India.

Uroplatus geckos, a species of nocturnal lizards endemic to Madagascar, use cryptic coloration to hide in tree bark during the daytime.